Introduction

For the Executive officers of the Association at Pittsburgh and the members of the Executive Council, the work is unrelenting. As soon as one Congress is completed, the work begins toward planning the next Congress. There is no period for rest and relaxation. For the staff their offices must seem like the eye of a storm that never abates. Already the tempo is increasing dramatically for LASA2000 in Miami. Co-chairs Anthony Maingot and Marysa Navarro are working steadily through the elaborate process of sorting the incoming proposals. By early summer they will have a good start on constructing the program that represents the core activity of LASA members at the March 2000 Congress. Individual and group proposals were to be sent before the April 2, 1999, deadline directly to Anthony Maingot, LASA 2000/FIU, DM 359B, Florida International University, Miami, Florida 33139. Proposals of panels from the various Sections, a feature inaugurated at the last Congress in Chicago, have a later deadline than panels proposed by individual members.

However, LASA is far more than just a large coming together every eighteen months. Reports to various foundations and organizations must be completed and submitted; and funds must be sought for various Association activities, especially travel assistance for the next LASA Congress. Some LASA Committees, such as the Finance and Support Committees, meet during the interval between Congresses, often in conjunction with the regularly scheduled meeting of the Executive Council.

LASA and Regional Cooperation

LASA has continued to reach out actively to other associations and organizations with a common interest in Latin America and the Caribbean. We have established semi-formal ties with the European-based Asociación de Historiadores Latinoamericanistas Europeos (AHILA). To date we have simply exchanged relevant information about each other but we hope to move beyond to more integrated activities in the near future. Last November I attended a meeting of the Red Latinoamericana de Cooperación Universitaria (RLCU) in Santiago, Chile. There I discussed with their Executive Committee possible ways in which the Red and LASA could work together. I have continued constructive discussions with representatives of the Red since. Eventually we hope to develop some areas in which concrete activities of mutual interest to both LASA and the Red might be pursued. LASA has also moved forward with its cooperation with the Archivo Nacional de Cuba and the Instituto de Historia. In the case of the Archivo, we have been working on a long term plan for creating training workshops on document conservation and preservation for archivists from a number of Cuban and Latin American archives. In the case of the Instituto, we have assisted the publication program with a modest grant, and hope that in the future we can continue to support this aspect of their activity. LASA has also appointed a representative to the project of the American Historical Association dealing with the interplay between area studies and global studies. Over the next two years that project will hold a series of activities designed to help teachers, especially in community colleges, develop new courses in world history. Also, as I mentioned in my last report, I am serving as the LASA representative to the American Council of Learned Societies. In my next report I will discuss more thoroughly matters of interest to the membership that arise during the upcoming annual meeting.

LASA and Area Studies

Despite our various outreach activities and our interest in global studies, LASA remains devoted to the strengthening of area studies, especially throughout Latin America and the Caribbean. Our membership is universal and includes individuals who live and work in Europe and Japan. Our members represent a variety of academic disciplines and practical interests. What brings us together and motivates us strongly is our profound interest in the history, politics, economy, culture and environment of the nearly 500 million people who inhabit that vast region southward and eastward of the Rio Grande. Understanding that region and its peoples is our passion as well as our vocation and we take it very, very seriously. It requires dedicated attention to the problems and the particulars across and within the region—a region that we believe provides ample exciting examples of fruitful comparisons and contrasts of the human experience across time.

Area studies as a focus does not, and properly should not, place itself in opposition to any other type of studies. On the contrary, effective area studies depends on and co-exists harmoniously with excellent local, regional, national and thematic studies produced within and across several academic disciplines. Effective area studies also depends on a strong command of the various languages of the region. Part of the rewarding dynamic between area studies and other types of studies rests in the intrinsic possibilities of enhanced reciprocal understanding when the local is placed in the context of the regional.

Similarly, the development of global studies should not be seen as somehow superceding area studies. Both are, and ought to be, compatible. Nevertheless, academies that seek to replace area studies with global studies often have a completely incorrect understanding of the individual roles of both sorts of activities. The fact that technology has created a more integrated world does not indicate that the world suddenly loses the vitality, viability, and illustrativeness of its regional variations. Global commerce does not by itself make the United States of America any less distinct an area than it was before. The same may be said for Europe, or Africa, or India, or Latin America. Indeed, global contacts may create a necessity for a better and more sophisticated understanding of those geographical zones newly integrated into the ambit of global trade networks. Without excellent area studies there can be no sound global studies. To understand the world better is to understand its component parts better. High quality local studies create high quality area studies. High quality area studies, then, should be a prerequisite for high quality global studies. It is like building a house. Without good components and a sound foundation the building might look like a house but is in fact a hazard. The rush to abandon area studies for the novelty of global studies carries the risk of undermining the enterprise at its very inception.

LASA is a strong organization and its membership continues to grow. It provides a vehicle where intellectual cross-fertilization takes place efficaciously and constantly. That is both its current strength and its future promise. Working together we will eventually achieve a seamless intellectual web across the Americas. Then we will be ready to take on larger, more global tasks.

Program Chairs and Staff At Work

By the time you read this, LASA2000 program co-chairs Anthony Maingot and Marysa Navarro will be sifting through thousands of submissions for the Miami Congress, March 16-18, 2000. The best thing we can do now is to let them be about their tasks. They will be providing an update for the next Forum. See also the web pages dedicated to LASA2000 at http://www.pitt.edu/~lasa/lasa2000.htm.

For your information, the list of track chairs was published in the Winter 1999 Forum, and contact information for each of them has now been posted on the LASA2000 pages on the website. Please note, however, that track chairs receive materials only from the program co-chairs, and not from proposers. Please do not make inquiries of the track chairs about specific proposals. Thanks!

The process works like this. Once the program co-chairs have consolidated proposed individual papers into existing session proposals or have created sessions for those papers, they submit these proposals, along with session proposals submitted "intact," to the chair(s) of the most appropriate track. The track chairs will end up ranking the proposals in their tracks. The number of sessions that will end up being accepted for the program will be determined by the quality of the proposals and the number of meeting rooms available; the number of sessions accepted for each track will be approximately proportional to the number of submitted proposals that fit that track.

Thanks to all who submitted requests to participate in LASA2000. We all are working hard to make sure the quality of this XXII International Congress exceeds all expectations.
FILM FESTIVAL AND FILM EXHIBIT AT LASA2000

Latin American Studies Association XXII international Congress

Miami, Florida USA -- March 16-18, 2000

Film and video materials not integrated into a panel, workshop, or other regular Congress session may be featured at LASA2000 in three venues:

I. LASA2000 FILM FESTIVAL: You may submit a film or video to compete for the juried designation of "LASA 2000 Award of Merit in Film," which is given for "excellence in the visual presentation of educational and artistic materials on Latin America." Approximately 15 such designations will be made, and these films and videos will be screened free of charge in the LASA2000 Film Festival. Selection criteria for this designation are: artistic, technical, and cinematographic excellence; uniqueness of contribution to the visual presentation of materials on Latin America; and relevance to disciplinary, geographic, and thematic interests of LASA members, as evidenced by topics proposed for panels, workshops, and special sessions at recent Congresses. Films and videos released after September 1998 and those that will premiere at the LASA Congress will be given special consideration, if they also meet the above criteria. LASA membership is not required to compete.

To enter the competition for the LASA2000 Film Festival, mail one copy of the COMPLETED SUBMISSION FORM, along with a VHS copy of your film or video to: LaVonne C. Poteet, Coordinator, LASA2000 Film Committee, Bucknell University, Lewisburg, PA 17837. Tel: 570-523-1408; fax: 570-524-0933; email: poteet@bucknell.edu. Send a duplicate copy of the form (without materials) to: Reid Reading, LASA, 946 Wun. Pitt Union, University of Pittsburgh, PITTSBURGH PA 15260.

II. All the information you need to keep in touch with LASA members throughout the world!

Use the 1999 membership form to order. This handy, bound volume contains names and addresses of all 1998 individual LASA members, as well as a listing of institutional LASA members, all indexed by discipline and primary country or sub-region of interest.
"Every time that our country's name appears with profusion in the international press, it is because something bad has happened. Never, or almost never, are we mentioned for some positive action, for something that would really make us proud." Whether it was the banana-republic, the militarized state, the puppet of the United States, or the site of devastating hurricanes such as Fifi and Mitch, international images of Honduras have been overwhelmingly negative and derogatory. For this reason, recent developments in civil-military relations deserve special attention.

At a particularly lively LASA98 panel chaired by J. Samuel Fitch, experts disagreed on whether military power in South America had remained strong or declined in recent years: Wendy Hunter, David Pion-Berlin, and Harold Trinkunas argued for the latter position while Brian Loveman and Jorge Zavarsnica defended the former. While the debate rages for South America, the 27 January 1999 ceremonial passing of the staff of command from Armed Forces Chief Mario Hung Pacheco to President Carlos Roberto Flores Facusse highlights a dramatic decline in military autonomy in Honduras and marks the end of a sorry chapter in U.S. policy. This rapid collapse of military power and institutional autonomy is surprising given the conventional wisdom among Latin Americanists that civilian politicians in this quintessential banana republic are either puppets of the armed forces or too weak to challenge the generals and their tanks. While changes in U.S. policy in the 1990s have been crucial for the positive changes in Honduran civil-military relations, I argue that a strong domestic antipathy towards the military dating from the 1950s helps to explain how civilians could gain the upper hand on the armed forces after more than forty years of military autonomy. This article briefly presents three periods of development for the Honduran military and locates the forces that shaped its ascent and recent decline.

Militarizing the Banana Republic

Unlike any of the other five Central American republics (including Costa Rica), the military had no political influence in Honduras from 1900 to 1950. Indeed, in Honduran newspapers prior to 1954, it is difficult to find any mention whatsoever of the armed forces. The military is conspicuously absent from the discussion of important political actors in Stokes' landmark 1950 study of Honduran politics. There simply was no institutionalized and professional military until the 1950s.

The year 1954 was a watershed for Honduras and the region. The CIA not only unearthed its counter-revolutionary leader—Castillo Armas—in Honduras but used the country as a training site and launching area for the overthrow of Arbenz. The Honduran operation was headed up by U.S. Ambassador Whitting Willauer, a consummate anti-communist who had never stepped foot in Central America before he arrived in Tegucigalpa in February 1954. His previous experience working for the CIA and the Chinese Nationalists in the late 1940s sensitized him to the evils of communism and he was determined to rid the country of leftist threats. Willauer's policies in Honduras embodied the U.S. position that the building up of a strong military with close ties to Washington was the best safeguard against leftist perils. On 20 May 1954, in a quid pro quo for Honduran support of the Castillo Armas invasion and as a continuation of U.S. military assistance policies in Latin America, the United States and Honduras signed a Bilateral Agreement of Military Assistance that called for U.S. military aid in exchange for free access to raw materials that may be needed by the United States. The First Infantry Battalion was organized by the United States on 20 July 1954—less than a month after the fall of Arbenz—and remained under U.S. jurisdiction until August of 1956. With alleged communists in neighboring Guatemala and leftists participating in banana strikes on the Honduran north coast, Washington wanted insurance for their many investments.

On 21 October 1956, a mere two years after the armed forces took institutional shape, the colonels ousted Julio Lozano in the first military coup in the country in the 20th century. The armed forces had quickly emerged as the most powerful institution in the country. That power was codified in the 1957 Constitution. In exchange for allowing the progressive Ramón Villeda Morales to take the presidency in 1957, military strongman Oswaldo López and Ambassador Willauer (who did not trust Villeda and who deprived him of an election in 1954) helped compose Title XIII of the magna carta that gave the armed forces unparalleled power and autonomy. Articles 318 through 330 established that the Chief of the Armed Forces would be selected by the military and that soldiers would be obedient to him and not to the president, that the Chief of the Armed Forces could use his discretion in obeying or disobeying the president, that civilian courts would have no jurisdiction over crimes by soldiers, and that civilians would have no access to or oversight of military budgets.

The Early Negative Public Reaction to Militarization

An examination of newspapers from the 1950s reveals a rather remarkable hostile reaction from civil society towards the military buildup. On 22 May 1954, a mere two days after the signing of the military agreement with the U.S., a letter appeared in Acción Democrática from one Antonio Gómez Milla ridiculing "the spectacular notice that invites us to laugh that Honduras and the United States of America will soon sign a military pact, and it makes us laugh because Honduras has never fought with anybody and has no one to fight with...we should seek another position...one misplaced comma can lead to complete enslavement (by the U.S.)..." This touched off a long and sophisticated public debate in the newspapers, particularly in El Cronista, that lasted through 1963. Anti-military schoolteachers, university students, politicians, and other citizens did not argue merely that the armed forces should remain small, but rather proposed that the institutions should not exist at all. A national dialogue emerged as military officers and spokespersons countered each anti-military letter published in the press with arguments such as "If you want peace, prepare for war" and "If in Chile there has never been and there will never be the military caste that you so greatly fear, why can't Honduras structure a similar armed forces?" 15

In May of 1959, Francisco Milla Bermúdez, then Magistrate of the Supreme Court, and Designate to the Presidency—and one of the leaders of the Liberal Party who actively participated in the constitutional deal-making that granted near omnipotent powers to the military—declared to the Miami Herald that the best thing for Honduras would be the dissolution of the armed forces. The armed forces, added Milla, consumed too great a part of the budget and the army was politically aligned with enemies of the government (El Cronista, 11 May 1959).

The generals were furious with the Milla statement. The general public was not. In an article entitled "The Popular Opinion Says that We Suppress the Army," the country’s principal daily reported that the public response to Milla’s comments were completely unexpected; the people want the soldiers to abandon the barracks and "seek other more dignified means of daily sustenance" (El Cronista, 14 May 1959). The university students also seconded Milla’s proposal. El Cronista reproduced a declaration from the UNAH (Universidad Autónoma de Honduras) student federation which "applauds" Milla and adds that the students were neither supporters nor adversaries of Villeda’s "Government of the Second Republic," but that "yes we are enemies of the military caste, because when this OGRE grows, dictatorships result" (15 May 1959). Milla responded that he was not the enemy of the military, but that he did aspire to follow the lead of Costa Rica and replace barracks with schools. 6 Of course, the genie was already out of the bottle and the United States would never have permitted the demilitarization of Honduras. 7 But as we will see, a strong domestic hostility to the military, while repressed during the period from late 1963 to 1989, re-emerged in the 1990s and contributed to the rapid descent of the Honduran armed forces.

The Sixties and Seventies

The 1963 election campaign favored Modesto Rodas Alvarado, the charismatic and fiery former president of the Constitutional Assembly, who promised to large campaign crowds that he would reduce the power of the military. At the height of the campaign season, Costa Rican Foreign Minister Daniel Oduber visited the country with an endorsement for demilitarization: "The communist threat is banished with laws that benefit the peasants. I don’t believe that the armed forces are even necessary in our countries" (El Cronista, September 1963). There was a ground swell of support from various sectors of Honduran society to follow the Costa Rican model and proscribe the military. But a violent pre-emptive coup was launched a mere ten days before the October 1963 elections, ending a six-year democratic opening in the country and effectively silencing the debate on demilitarization. The United States would wait barely two months after the violent and repressive coup to crawl back to the generals and recognize the military regime. The embarrassing fact is that U.S. commitment to democracy was secondary to a militarized response to real and imagined communist threats.

The Honduran Tiger (nickname for the Honduran armed forces) ruled the country with only brief interruptions for two decades. The 1963-1972 period can be characterized as repressive and hostile. The 1972-1975 period witnessed a marked change in military rule, with younger officers joining the formerly repressive Oswaldo López in a progressive, nation-building imitation of the Velasco regime in Peru. The reformist nature of the regime slowed markedly in 1975 when López was linked to the United Fruit Co. "Bananagate" bribery scandal. After López refused to permit an investigative commission access to his Swiss bank accounts, he was ousted as head of state. The new man in charge was Juan Melgar Castro, a conservative officer who had cultivated ties with the younger officers. While some land reform continued, the explicit progressive military experiment ended a little more than two years after it began. In June 1975, the repressive military returned when soldiers and large landowners massacred fourteen peasants taking part in a hunger march. The Melgar government was decidedly anti-labor, anti-cooperative, and increasingly tied to drug trafficking. Melgar himself fell to another internal military coup led by Policarpio Paz García in 1978.

The Incompatible U.S. Policies of Democracy and Militarization in the 1980s

The 1980s witnessed a most unusual hybrid regime in Honduras, the initiation and strengthening of electoral democracy along with shocking increases in military power and human rights abuses. Honduras in the 1980s embodied U.S. policy of low-intensity democracy and high-intensity anti-communism. Injections of military aid and anti-terrorist training, and unconditional public support by the U.S. Embassy for the actions of the armed forces was akin to pumping large doses of steroids into the neighborhood bully; the result was quickly expanding strength and a feeling of invincibility on the part of los gloriosos, that when combined with a self-perceived spiritual calling to save the country from progressives, resulted in a marked increase in human rights violations. The commander in chief from 1982-1984 was General Gustavo Alvarez Martínez, a violent anti-communist who had been trained at the School of the Americas in Fort Benning, the Superior War College in Peru, and the National Military Academy in Argentina. In the late 1970s, Alvarez founded Intelligence Battalion 3-16, the ruthless death squad comprised of elite U.S.-trained soldiers that recruited ex-soldiers from the Central Penitentiary for some of the dirtiest jobs. In the first 26 months after the return to "democracy", 128 disappearances were registered. For the period January 1988-July 1989, long past the height of the abuses—the Committee for the Defense of Human Rights (CODEH) documented 13 forced disappearances, 322 assassinations, 470 cases of torture, and 2,058 illegal arrests.

During the entire 1980s, the U.S. needed the Honduran military as an ally in the contra war and not only regularly ignored/denied evidence of human rights abuses but "advocated executions, torture, blackmail and other forms of coercion" openly in U.S. Army intelligence manuals used to train Latin American military officers (Washington Post, 21 September 1996). The United States provided some $350 million in military aid from 1984-1989, hundreds of millions more in other military assistance such as military bases, and continual public support of the army against charges of corruption and abuses even though local CIA agents were aware of the torture and disappearances.

The Honduran armed forces were also gaining financial independence. The military pension fund owns and operates one of the country's largest banks, an insurance company, an investment company, a credit card company, an advertising and printing company, a financial consulting firm, a radio station, African palm plantations and an oil factory, a shrimp farm, a crustacean exporter, and a funeral home and cemetery that are seen by some Hondurans as ironic examples of vertical integration given the military's involvement in assassinations and disappearances. In a bizarre example of privatization, the Honduran government privatized the Honduran Cement Company by selling it to the military at a low price of $22 million and with highly favorable terms of only $80 thousand down. The military also owns shoe factories, clothing factories, a car dealership, a barbed-wire company, munitions and arms companies, real estate concerns, land for possible tourism developments, and the abandoned Sheraton-Tegucigalpa hotel project. The military pension fund has become the nation's fifth largest corporate conglomerate with annual profits estimated at $US40 million. In addition, the military had a monopoly on private security and controlled the merchant marine, the telephone company, customs, and the airports. With no civilian oversight of military budgets, there were opportunities for siphoning huge amounts of money from these "public" entities. As the 1980s closed, the Honduran armed forces were constitutionally autonomous, protected and supported by the United States, and financially robust. The Tiger was strong and feeling invincible.

The Honduran Military after Cold War

When Crescencio Arcos was nominated as the U.S. Ambassador to Honduras in 1990, the generals must have been delighted. Arcos was a U.S. Embassy official in Tegucigalpa in the early 1980s who helped establish the secret busing of the contras in Honduras and the transfer of huge sums of military aid to the Honduran armed forces. In the mid-1980s Arcos was Elliot Abrams' deputy for Central America and was the State Department expert on the contras. However, by 1990 the Cold War was over and as ambassador Arcos was now given a very different mission: to desilicate the very military monster that he had helped to fortify. Arcos accepted this 180-degree change in U.S. policy with enthusiasm and effectiveness. His pointed public denouncements of military impunity and the lack of justice outraged the colonels and pro-military President Callejas (1990-1994), and at the same time energized sectors of civil society who were fed up with the heavy military burden on Honduran society. The media, student groups, business leaders, labor, the Catholic Church, and human rights organizations such as the Committee for the Defense of Human Rights (CODEH) began a constant attack on the armed forces, with many of the denunciations similar to those made by civil society in the 1950s. U.S. military assistance also declined precipitously, falling from some US$41 million in 1989 to a mere US$2.7 million in 1993. The tide had turned.

Momentum against the military picked up with the presidential election of the Liberal Party's Carlos Roberto Reina in 1994. Reina, a long-time critic of the military and former president of the Inter-American Human Rights Court, campaigned on a platform of clean government and the reduction of military budgets and prerogatives. The public booing of the armed forces at the inauguration was a sign of just how low public respect for the institution had fallen. Reina withstood assassination attempts and military threats as he implemented crucial civil-military reforms. Military conscription was ended in 1994, the military's hated intelligence unit (DNI) that was implicated in many human rights abuses was disbanded in 1994, the military budget was reduced by 10 percent in 1994, and the military lost control of many state institutions such as the telephone company, immigration, and the merchant marine in 1996.

The most dogged supporter of the military has been the National Party. The National Party selected Nora de Melgar, the widow of former military strongman Juan Melgar, as its 1998 presidential candidate. The party was subsequently trounced by the Liberal's Carlos Flores Facussé, whose anti-military credentials were secured when, as president of the National Assembly, he procured legislative approval for Reina's military reforms. This marked the fourth electoral defeat in five elections for the National Party and the association of the party with the military has become a major electoral liability. This liability created incentives for party leaders to pressure a divided caucus to support President Flores's recent historic constitutional reforms, which were approved in the National Assembly by a vote of 128-0 on 26 January 1999.
The reforms are designed to end 42 years of military autonomy. The president is now commander in chief of the armed forces. Civilians have oversight over armed forces budgets. Article 278 of the amended constitution now mandates that "orders given by the President should be respected and executed" by all soldiers. The 54-member Armed Forces Superior Council, the military self-governing body that was characterized by murky internecine conflict, has been replaced by a five-member Council of Commanders. Following the Costa Rican example, all security forces are placed under the authority of the National Electoral Tribunal during the last month of national electoral campaigns.

And most significantly, the all-powerful post of Armed Forces Chief has been eliminated with all authority transferred to the defense minister. The president has authority to name and remove defense ministers. The first civilian defense minister to head the armed forces is Edgardo Dumas, an attorney, newspaper columnist, and former Honduran Ambassador in Washington.

These changes are transcendential. Yet, many civil-military questions and challenges remain. The reduction of military autonomy and prerogatives does not automatically translate into stronger civilian institutions. Hondurans understandably view democratic institutions—particularly the justice system—as corrupt, weak, and inefficient. Arrest orders by judges against former or current members of the armed forces for murder and disappearances have been ignored for years. Crime levels are escalating, and the police and military are considered more as criminals than crime fighters. Charges against the military and police for involvement in drug trafficking, car theft, and corruption continue to appear in the Honduran press.

And other military horrors regularly emerge. On 5 January 1999, officials decommissioned US$4.4 million of advanced weaponry, explosives, and anti-aircraft guns held in a military base near San Pedro Sula. The armed forces had been storing the weapons for ten years on behalf of Mario Delamico, a Cuban-American former collaborator of the CIA who has been linked to attempts on the life of then-President Reina. The military itself is deeply divided and many officers are disgruntled with recent reforms and the steep slide in military prestige. In the 1980s, the armed forces had some 25,000 troops, while today there are only 10,000 which includes 1,700 officials. Many in the military are now pressuring for a return to forced conscription, since the image of the military is so tarnished and the pay so low that few are willing to enlist. Military hardliners see the continued decline in inductees as a slow death for the institution.

The greatest challenge for Hondurans is to define the future role of the armed forces. With the Cold War over, a civilian police force responsible for crime fighting, and with no credible external threats to national security, elected officials and military spokesmen have named a host of potential institutional missions. These include protecting the environment; building infrastructure; helping the police battle crime, fight poverty, and lead the war on narcotrafficking (which would be another example of internecine conflict). To many Hondurans, these new military jobs smack of make-work projects and cover for military officials to continue to enrich themselves. In 1955, when the military was first gaining institutional strength, a Honduran citizen sent a letter to the editor of the leading newspaper with advice that has stood the test of time and that many Hondurans would presently applaud as they did in the 1954-63 period: "...everything has its time and when that time has passed, nature has provided an end that NOW IT SHOULD NOT EXIST. In ancient days, militaries were necessary. However, today there is nothing to justify the existence of militarization...now that the budget is in tatters, now when it would be wise to be economical with government expenditures, it would be a stupendous measure if the government would eliminate the defense minister, and with him all the commanders and soldiers in the country and establish in their place an efficient civil guard, and a mounted police to insure individual security in a civilized manner" (Néstor Enrique Alvarado in El Cronista, 9 May 1955).

University of North Carolina, 1998, the Honduran daily El Cronista from 1954-1963, and recent issues of Honduran newspapers El Heraldo, Honduras This Week, La Prensa, and La Tribuna.

5The first quote comes from army captain René Zelaya Smith in El Cronista, 30 May 1955, and the second from J. Simeon Alonzo of the military academy in El Cronista, 18 July 1955.

7In this time period, there are many references to following the "Tico" example and going sans armee. In April of 1958, Costa Rica attempted to push a proposal through the Organization of American States for the disarming of all of Latin America. The proposal was voted down (El Cronista, 18 April 1958). [1]
CALLING ALL MEMBERS

HURRICANE MITCH

The relief effort in Central America goes on and victims of the hurricane still need our help. We continue to urge LASA members to make contributions to agencies of their own choosing in the countries of their choice.

Oxfam America is accepting donations to help the survivors of Hurricane Mitch. Contributions to its Central America Relief and Reconstruction Fund are being channeled directly to its on-the-ground partners in Honduras, Nicaragua, Guatemala and El Salvador. Donations may be sent to Oxfam America (26 West Street, Boston, MA 02111) or charged to your credit card by phone (800/77-OXFAM) or online (www.oxfamamerica.org). Information on Oxfam’s program is also available on the web page. Anyone wanting to organize fund-raising events for the Fund should call 800/597-3278 for event support and materials.

Also, the Red Cross informs us that donations sent to P.O. Box 37243, Washington DC 20013 are quickly converted to material aid for the victims. See also www.redcross.org to donate online or call 1-800-HELP NOW. Be sure to indicate that your donation is for the Central American relief effort, specifying a country if you wish.

The International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies reports frequently on the Central American situation. A situation report dated 16 November 1998 is typical, and notes that the number of people affected by the storm is now estimated at 3,771,000, with 10,502 dead and nearly as many missing. Evacuations number more than 1.3 million. See www.ifrc.org for updates and for how to contribute on line or by mail via the Federation in Geneva.

Thanks for responding to this call!

THE COLOMBIAN DISASTER

The Red Cross of Colombia is accepting donations to help victims of the January 25 earthquake. Please help out by contributing to that organization, or to agencies of your choice. Access the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent societies website (above) for updates on the relief effort. The Colombian Red Cross site can be accessed from the Federation’s site.

THE YEAR 2000 LASA/OXFAM AMERICA MARTIN DISKIN MEMORIAL LECTURESHIP

The Martin Diskin Memorial Lectureship is offered at each LASA International Congress to an outstanding individual who combines the commitment that Diskin had both to activism and scholarship. The person so honored at LASA’s next Congress will deliver the memorial lecture at the Miami Congress, March 16-18, 2000.

This distinguished lectureship is made possible largely by a generous contribution from Oxfam America, an organization committed to grassroots work and one with which Martin Diskin was associated. Ricardo Falla, S.J., was the 1998 Diskin Lecturer.

Members of the Diskin Lectureship Committee 2000 are Charles R. Hale (Anthropology, University of Texas at Austin, chair), Aline Helg (History, University of Texas at Austin), and Stefano Varese (Native American Studies, University of California, Davis). Nominations, including self-nominations, are welcome. They should be sent to Hale (Department of Anthropology, University of Texas at Austin, Austin TX 78712, or electronically to crhale@mail.utexas.edu) by September 30, 1999. A nomination should include the complete street address of the nominee, telephone and fax numbers, and e-mail address, as well as a statement justifying the nomination.

The Book Awards—A Special Plea!

LASA does its best to make sure the Association book awards are highly publicized. In addition to posting these notices in at least one edition of the Forum (twice for LASA2000), we send flyers to all publishers we know about who might even remotely produce monographs that could be contenders for the Bryce Wood and Premio book awards.

The Secretariat would appreciate it very much if LASA members would contact appropriate publishers and inform them of these awards; this is especially important in the case of the Premio, since LASA is in the process of continuing to build its list of publishers of monographs in Spanish and Portuguese of interest to Latin Americanists. And of course, please make sure, if you are eligible for one of these awards, that you submit your publication!

NEWS FROM LASA

by John L. Hammond, Chair
jhammond@hunter.cuny.edu

The work of the Task Force has been in two main areas: recommending that LASA respond to human rights violations and commissioning articles on human rights issues for the LASA Forum.

Precedents for LASA action in response to violations turn out to be murky, and timely action by the Executive Council (EC) is difficult. Responding to members' requests for a response from LASA to violations from LASA, we worked out with President Susan Eckstein that the task force would draft a letter in her name as president and the name of the task force, take an e-mail ballot and, if a majority of the EC approved, recommend that she send it to appropriate officials. We made three such recommendations and in each case she sent the letter to: President Zedillo and others on the attack on Professor David Barkin of the Universidad Autónoma Metropolitana under suspicious circumstances in Mexico City; to Dr. Gustavo García de Paredes, rector of the University of Panama, on the threat to the academic freedom of Professors Miguel Antonio Bernal and Federico Ardila; and to President Arzu of Guatemala on the murder of Bishop Gerardi and other incidents.

As Chair I have commissioned articles for the recent issues of LASA Forum on human rights topics, including the Colombia peace process; attacks on journalists throughout the hemisphere; the extinction of indigenous cultures; the resurgence of violations in several countries in April and May of this year; the militarization of Chiapas and the place of human rights in the Mexican process of political reform; and the Pinochet case.

Even with the benefit of e-mail, coordination and timely response are not always easy. Nevertheless we feel the Task Force can perform an important function. We had some debate on whether it should restrict its attention to violations of academic freedom or be equally concerned about general human rights violations, with strong advocates for both positions. When we met in Chicago, we discussed the possibility of creating a section on human rights. While the idea has merits, we do not feel that such a section should replace the task force, whose main function is not to promote research and professional activities but to recommend LASA action in response to human rights violations.
LARR ON-LINE PROGRESSING

The Latin American Research Review on-line project is well underway at the Latin American and Iberian Institute at the University of New Mexico. You can find LARR on the World Wide Web at http://larr.unm.edu/. The LARR web site contains the index of all of LARR's articles up through 1996, as well as the table of contents from current issues, which are available free of charge. Already, you can search LARR's index by keyword, subject, authors, volume and issue numbers, and dates. You can also read the current issue's table of contents on-line. Soon subscribers will be able to request a user name and password to read this year's first issue in full-text on the web site.

Access to the full text of LARR's current and back issues will only be available to paying subscribers and LASA members whose dues are paid. We are in the process of building an on-line archive of back issues of LARR on this web site. Currently we are not yet offering the on-line access to institutional subscribers. Information on joining LASA and subscribing to LARR is also available on the LARR home page. While loading the back issues of LARR into the archive will be a long-term project, we will have the web site fully operational for accessing the index, reading the table of contents and abstracts, and current issues, as well as for placing your subscription orders on-line by October 1999.

NEW 21ST CENTURY TASK FORCE OFFICER NAMED

LASA is pleased to announce that A. Douglas Kincaid, Florida International University, has been named to chair the Task Force on LASA and the 21st Century. Kincaid succeeds Mark Rosenberg. Mark was instrumental in launching the Task Force, in obtaining a grant from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, and in tracing a set of electronically related initiatives for the Association to undertake. Thanks to Mark and a warm welcome to Doug!

LASA98 PAPERS AVAILABLE

By the time LASA members read this edition of the Forum, they will be able to access electronically a good number of papers from the LASA98 Chicago Congress. Thanks to the excellent cooperation of hundreds of scholars and practitioners who presented in Chicago, LASA members will be able eventually to download at least 500 papers—150 percent of the number of presentations available from LASA97. And we expect to be adding more as time goes on.

At the time the papers were posted, the authors held any and all copyrights and granted permission to LASA to place the papers. However, some papers may have been published in one form or another subsequent to their receipt by LASA. Thus, to ensure proper attribution in any citation, the author should be contacted. Consult the LASA Member Directory for contact information.

Thanks again to all those who answered the call to make their findings and analyses accessible to their colleagues.

FOLLOW-UP TO CUBA RESOLUTION

To the Editor:

A resolution on Cuba signed by some 100 members of LASA—including ten former LASA presidents, more than half of the current Executive Council members, and leading Latin Americanists from the United States, Latin America and Europe—was published in this column in the Winter 1999 Forum. The names of Denise Dresser, Richard Fagen, and Charles R. Hale were inadvertently omitted.

The resolution expressed support for lifting the ban on the sale of food and medicine to Cuba, urged the United States government to open negotiations with the Cuban government aimed at normalizing relations between the two countries, and urged the Cuban Government to adhere to the democratic principles proclaimed in the Viña de Mar declaration signed by President Fidel Castro at the VI Iberoamerican Summit.

On behalf of the signatories, I sent the resolution to U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright directly, and to Cuban Foreign Minister Roberto Robaina via the Cuban Interests Section in Washington, D.C. Mr. Fernando Remírez de Estenoz’s response to my request that he forward the resolution to Havana is reproduced below; Secretary Albright has not responded.

Estimada Marifeli:

Con la presente te devuelvo la carta y resolución que me enviaste el pasado 19 de enero. Como comprenderás no me siento obligado a servir de mensajero de algo que tan poco servicio hace a la Patria; como bien dijo un reconocido miembro de LASA en el momento que intentaste pasar esta resolución en el pasado Congreso de Chicago, no hay derecho a la intromisión de los asuntos internos de Cuba. Si hay preocupación por el presente y futuro de la Isla, no es difícil adivinar a quién hay que dirigirle, no tímidas medidas que no resuelven el problema, sino el levantamiento total del bloqueo.

Atentamente,

Fernando Remírez
Jefe de la Sección de Intereses

El Instituto Latinoamericano de Servicios Legales Alternativos (ILSA) está desarrollando una conferencia electrónica que busca abrir el debate frente al tema de las políticas que la Banca Multilateral viene desarrollando en América Latina y el Caribe, con relación a los temas de la reforma a la justicia y derecho y género. La conferencia denominada "Democratizando el proceso de reforma de las instituciones de Bretton Woods" cumple un año de trabajo en el cual se han distribuido 30 documentos del Banco Mundial relacionados con el tema; para su segundo año de trabajo nos proponemos conocer y difundir las políticas y proyectos que el Banco Interamericano de Desarrollo (B.I.D.) está promoviendo en América Latina y el Caribe en el tema Reforma a la Justicia, sin embargo continuaremos suministrando información del Banco Mundial y otras instituciones. Otros elementos que se incorporarán este año en nuestra conferencia son: Primero: Diálogo sur-surf en el cual estamos buscando contactos con ONG de Asia y África donde se están desarrollando reformas a la administración de Justicia, con fin de suministrar esta información a la red electrónica y poder determinar similitudes o no dentro del proceso. Segundo: Creación de un grupo de discusión sobre el tema con el fin de contribuir teóricamente en el proceso. Tercero: Concurso de ensayo sobre el tema: Política de la Banca Multilateral en la Reforma a la Justicia en América Latina. Jill Kuhnheim and Danny Anderson are seeking abstracts for a collection of essays on the evolution and applications of Cultural Studies in classrooms that focus on Latin American languages, literatures, and cultures. These essays should combine cross-disciplinary approaches and a pedagogical focus to explore specific examples from various Latin American contexts. The collection will include perspectives of both secondary and post secondary instructors, since one of its primary purposes is to open dialogue between these two groups. The essays will demonstrate how teachers have successfully combined the theories of Cultural Studies with the practices of teaching Spanish, Portuguese, and Amerindian languages, literatures, and cultures. In this way, the volume will demonstrate how the field of Cultural Studies and the various fields of Latin American language, literature, and culture are transformed when put in contact with one another. The collection will stress the juncture between academics, teachers, and global issues by examining the meaning and role of culture in Latin American society, how languages and cultures interact, and effective methods of cross-cultural teaching. Please send two copies of a 500-word abstract by June 15, 1999 to Danny Anderson, Dept. of Spanish and Portuguese, University of Kansas, Wescoe Hall 3062, Lawrence, Kansas 66045-2166. Email queries may be directed to either Danny Anderson (djan@falcon.ukans.edu) or Jill Kuhnheim (kuhnheim@facstaff.wisc.edu).

Meridians is a new feminist interdisciplinary journal whose goal is to provide a forum for the finest scholarship and creative work by and about women of color in a U.S. and an international context. The journal is a collaborative venture of the Women's Studies Program at Smith College and Wesleyan University and is published twice a year by Wesleyan University Press. We are currently seeking submissions for the premiere issues, to be published in 2000. The work we publish lies at the intersections of race, gender, and nationalism. We recognize that the terms women of color, feminism, race, and transnationalism are contested. Meridians engages the complexity of these debates in a dialogue across traditional disciplinary boundaries and across ethnic and national boundaries. While we acknowledge our U.S.-based location, we particularly welcome work that contributes to the understanding of post-colonialism, nationalism, sexuality, and women's activism throughout the world. The journal foregrounds how women of color frame vital questions that interrogate the various meanings of their multiple political and social locations using new theories and methods of research. Meridians will feature crucial discussions about the conditions of women's lives that are relevant and useful to more than a narrow audience, and may address academics, public intellectuals and activists. The specificities of history, geography, and culture will inform the practices and meanings of women's political and economic lives, the forms and meanings of resistance, diaspora and exile, artistic expression, and activist strategies. Meridians invites submissions of essays, interviews, poetry, fiction, theater, artwork, photo-essays, as well as political manifestos, position papers, and archival documents of continuing interest. Meridians accepts submissions on a rolling basis. Submissions are reviewed by members of the editorial board and by readers with competence in the appropriate fields. The review process usually takes about 3 months. Please submit three copies of the manuscript and three copies of an abstract of not more than 150 words to: Meridians, Smith College, Northampton, MA 01063. Manuscripts without abstracts will not be considered. We cannot accept electronic submissions. All submissions should be word-processed, double spaced, unstapled and accompanied by a title page. The title page should contain the author's name, postal address and e-mail address. The author's name should not appear on the manuscript, and all references in the text and in footnotes that might identify the author should be removed and cited on a separate page. Scholarly articles should follow the Chicago Manual of Style, 14th edition, for text and endnotes. Articles should not exceed 25-30 pages or 9000 words. Please submit visual material and black and white prints rather than slides. Manuscripts of 3-5 poems should be typed double-spaced. Prose or fiction manuscripts should be typed double-spaced and be no longer than 25 pages. Excerpts from works of fiction or theater are acceptable if self-contained. Please do not submit manuscripts or materials that are under review elsewhere or that have been previously published. Meridians does not accept unsolicited book, film or video reviews. Submissions cannot be returned. For more information about Meridians please visit us at our website: www.smith.edu/meridians or through e-mail at Meridians@Smith.edu or by fax 413-585-3393, or phone 413-585-3390. Manuscripts will be reviewed within 3 months.

Subnational Politics and Democratization in Mexico

edited by Wayne Cornelius, Todd Eisenstadt & Jane Hindley

Contributors highlight the growing disjuncture between Mexico's accelerated transition to democracy at the national level and what is occurring at the state and local levels in many parts of the country.

Drawing on recent field research in ten Mexican states, the contributors show how the increasingly uneven character of democratization in Mexico can be a significant obstacle to the completion of the process in an expeditious and low-conflict manner.

Electoral Observation and Democratic Transitions in Latin America

edited by Kevin J. Middlebrook

What impact has electoral observation had on transitions to democracy in Latin America, and what direction should it take in the future? In addressing these and related questions, the contributors examine the evolution of electoral observation strategies since the 1980s, the relative contributions that foreign and domestic observers can make to free and fair elections and to the democratization process more generally, and the principal lessons learned from electoral observation initiatives in Latin America during the 1980s and 1990s. The volume includes six country studies: the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, and Panama.

Myths and [Mis]Perceptions: Changing U.S. Elite Visions of Mexico

Sergio Aguayo Quezada

This most recent look at the U.S.–Mexico bilateral relationship highlights how an implicit understanding dating from the 1920s has long guided these countries' perceptions of one another and enabled them to survive moments of extreme tension in their relations—and also how and why that situation is beginning to change. Basing his analysis on a review of Mexico-related newspaper articles and complementing this with extensive interviewing and documentary research, Aguayo gives us an intriguing look behind the scenes to discover what really drives the interaction between these two countries.

Mexico's Hope tells the dramatic story of the making of modern Mexico. In the course of providing compelling analysis of the causes for the vast divide between Mexico's rich and poor, James Cockcroft illuminates the stark contrast between the country's corrupt political system and its people's democratic aspirations.

Mexican economic development is distorted and uneven. Cockcroft explains, because of a longstanding collusion between foreign interests and a domestic ruling class. He describes why important challenges to elite power, including the revolution of 1910-1920 and the 1968 student rebellion, failed to break the grip of the dominant classes.

With particular attention to the contributions of women, Indians, workers, and peasants, Mexico's Hope is informed by the conviction that the country's most promising prospects today lie in the quest of its poorest people for social justice and democracy, from the recent Zapatista uprisings in Chiapas to ongoing electoral efforts on the left.

REMINISCENCES OF THE CUBAN REVOLUTIONARY WAR
by CHE GUEVARA

"Reflects the life of an extraordinary and important man."—LIBRARY JOURNAL

"When Che Guevara cast his lot with Marxism and revolution the world of letters suffered an incalculable loss. Guevara is a brilliant, thoughtful writer. He is lucid, candid, and revealing.... If Guevara had spent his time at the typewriter instead of leading revolutionaries, then this world would be hailing a new giant in literature."—CLEVELAND PRESS
